DANIEL F. M'NEIL SAFETY ON HIGHWAYS.

Up in Massachusetts there is a deways The number of accidents and fatalities calls forth the suggestion along the wooded highways so as to give a better view of the roads, especially at corners where it is now obcuts should be sloped back so that great as those already disclosed. nothing, trees, ledges or embankments, should be in the way of a clear observation for a long distance. Even the expense of such operations is not overlooked when it is declared it hasn't started the girls longing for big would amount to about as much as the cost of keeping the roads in good

That this would contribute some the removal of the excuses that are given for accidents must be acknowledged, and therein it might be looked upon as a contribution to safety, but it is an altogether too one-sided proposition and an encouragement of conditions on highways which are more responsible for accidents than the natural growth or the contour of the Speed and the failure to assume the responsibility which devolves upon the drivers of automobiles are the undeniable cause of the deplorable situation and to put the roads and the property bordering in such condition that it would only invite greater laxity and disrespect for proper conduct on the highways would simply mean the building of a race course instead of insuring safety. It is the rigid enforcement of respect for the law concerning the use of high-ways which is needed and Massachusetts is not the only state which needs to give this matter better attention. Connecticut's fatalities each month show that greater safety must come through obedience of the law and not through giving the violators greater

Some practical form of rural credits banking seems assured in a great many parts of the country, certainly in farming sections of Connecticut, there is a demand for a banking addition to present facilities. Existing institutions do not care to undertake the business under consideration, and the Morris plan banks do not go far enough for the purpose. The initial steps have been taken on the Pacific coast. Myron T. DISCOVERY OF MESA VERDE.

DISCOVERY OF MESA VERDE.

Our Most Wonderful Prehistoric Ruins Found by Chance by Rranchmen Hunting for Lost Cattle.

It appears strange that the greatest of American prehistoric ruins, those now inclosed in the Mesa Vede National Park in southwestern Colorado, should have escaped discovery until 1888. Years before, innumerable ancient ruins left in several other states by the ancestors of the Pueblo Indians had been described and pictured. They had been treated in books of science and books of travel; they had become a familiar American spectacle. It appears strange that the greatest and books of travel;; they had become a familiar American spectacle.
Even the ruins in the Mancos Canyon in Colorado were explored as early as 1874. Mr. W. H. Jackson, who led the Government party, found there many small dwellings broken down by the weather. The next year he was
